Does a "good side" of CEO hubris exist? What is the "bad side" of CEO humility? How will entrepreneurial leaders' psychological biases be reflected in judgments that shape new venture formation and failure? How can corporate leaders dominate overambitious projects that frequently generate instances of corporate social irresponsibility? Answers to these questions are crucial to advise managers of the dangers of psychological bias and, even more importantly, to encourage practices that promote effectiveness in decision processes. The PDW is a tremendous chance for scholars and researchers to discuss theoretical and empirical challenges in the psychological foundations of management!
